Toddlers Learn Complex Actions from Picture-book Reading

A study published by the American Psychological Association shows that interaction with life-like pictures can aid in children’s learning. To test a young child’s learning ability from picture books, the researchers tested if toddlers, ages 18-30 months, could imitate specific target actions on novel real-world objects on the basis of a picture-book interaction. The study showed that many of the children were able to imitate the actions depicted and described in the book. The very young children were able to learn and perform novel actions with novel objects from brief picture-book reading interaction. The books with the most similarity between the actual object and what was presented in the book had the most influence on the youngest children’s reenactment. Picture book reading interaction takes place very early in children’s lives and may provide an important source of information to them about the world.
